THE EVERYWHERE CROWD

A comedy idea by Jonathan David Steinhoff
zoomsteinhoff@aol.com
©9/2/11

A world built upon an odd premise. In spite of all the arguments on time travel with which you are no doubt already familiar, of the scientific impossibility, and inherent paradoxes even if it were possible, time travel is as inexpensive and commonplace in this world as making a phone call, and no one could care less about the reverberating consequences that perpetually result. Well, occasionally people have reactions.

Therefore, no place in time is left untouched. People from different places and times exist side by side at all times throughout history, though this only started thirty years ago, in 2432. Nothing throughout time remains stable, it's all becoming increasingly malleable, and so one person might ask a stranger whether he knows whether Lincoln was still assassinated. The answer might be, "Assassinated? Last I heard, they fixed it so Lincoln won't be assassinated for another four hundred years, on the day they unfreeze him, some nut shoots him." "Oh, how dreadful." "Yes, however, I'm certain someone will put a stop to it. Did I say someone? I heard that to keep George Washington from getting shot in the Revolutionary War, thousands of people from different points in time converged to prevent known occurrences of Washington's death. I'm sure it'll be more or less the same for Lincoln." "Always liked George Washington." "Yessir, and fine racing car driver as well." "Indeed."

The End